HOW AN INDIAN WAS NAMED

Indian children, like any other children, were named soon after they were born. Sometimes the tribe's medicine man named them or a relative did. The entire village took part in the celebration of the naming.

The children were named after animals, plants, trees or some natural occurrence that happened sometime during their birth.

A girl kept her name throughout her life but a man might change his through a dream vision he had or by performing a great deed in battle or by fighting an animal like a bear or a wolf. If a man had a birth defect, he might also be named for that particular defect.

The man's name was recorded as a pictograph. Following are some examples:

CRAZY HORSE

STANDING BEAR

	Commanche and Sioux. Tipis were cone shaped, built around a structure of poles placed in a tripod fashion then covered with animal skins. Tipis were ordinarily 10' x 12' high and some were painted with symbols depicting great tribal events. The fireplace was in the center with a hole in the top of the tipi for smoke to escape.

HISTORICAL AID: Corn was a main food source in North American Indian cookery. Its uses varied from being eaten straight off the cob to boiling it to make a kind of corn coffee. (A bean mixture made by boiling beans with a lump of fat and adding green corn became a favorite dish of the English settlers.) Corn meal was made by pounding the kernels until they were a fine flour. The meal was made into
